Paul:

When we initially spoke, I was told that you had no questions about the documents I faxed to you. That they were clear.

I appreciate the need for cross-examination as a normal part of due process. I can only submit to a third-party examination of this case with an attorney present. I will be forced to show this attorney all of the facts in the case, including the documents I faxed to you. He or she will want to question everyone else that was involved. I see this as an unnecessary escalation that places me in an adversarial position with our company. This would be both tragic and ironic, since I have done everything in my power to keep Farmers out of harm's way.

My bigger concern is that, while this process takes place, a man who has directly threatened my career, continues to function as my superior. How do we continue business as usual in such a hostile environment? How do I communicate with Brian Braddock without an attorney present?

Signed:

Paul A Drockton M.A.
